An Expanded Concept of Hope

Nademus

Good Day entities! And it is a very wonderful and satisfying day, one that holds hope at its very premise. The concept of hope has been experienced by your world under many different guises such as the hope for a better life, the hope for a medical breakthrough, children as the hope for the future. Individually you each have expressed and experienced hope in the form of dreams for potential achievements, expressions of longing for unfulfilled desires, and even within goal orientation. Your hopes and dreams seem to light up your life. As children, you were introduced to the concept of hope by well-meaning adults whose hopes may or may not have been reached, but for whom the concept is as natural as sunrise in the morning. Hope appears to be a natural outgrowth of being alive, innocent in its appeal and purposeful in its function.

I would very much like to offer another view of hope, one that is indeed expanded from what is commonly understood by you as normal. I would offer that old paradigm hope is a statement that belies the fact that you each are divine aspects of All That Is. Hope, as you understand it, is a means by which you quite literally place yourself outside of your reality, forming in your dreams a point of reference from which you create separation as a profoundly normal aspect of life. Separation must occur when you view your reality, and your potential, as something outside of yourself.

When you are in a state of wanting, dreaming of, hoping for, and seeking, you are viewing yourself as disconnected from that aspect for which you are hoping and seeking. When you view yourself as outside of your dreams, you are literally viewing them from more than one point of view. In other words, separation becomes for you a reality from which you articulate life from the perspective of lack and wanting. Some of you reading this may be saying, but what is the harm of hoping for a better life, a healthy baby, or a raise? Yes, what is the harm? To that I will say, of course, there is no harm, as harm is a concept of separation and it is my desire to provide for you the foundational understanding that you are all-powerful and fully in control of your reality.

The concept of potential harm demeans your experience by setting forth an illusory idea of what reality is. The concept of harm fits perfectly within the concept of victimization. Both are ideas about separation, ideas that promote fear and ideas that are not integral in the living God you are. So, no, no harm is done in wanting a better life. But to recognize that you want a better life is a direct statement that the life you are currently leading is not, in your consideration, good enough. You have not only placed a judgment on your life condition, you have also separated yourself from the potential to empower fulfillment.

Be very clear that you hold immense power. Be very certain that you are the creator of your reality. This certainty is all that is required for you to dispel the separating concept of hope and to usher in the recognition of the expanded concept of hope which is a statement of your involvement with your spiritual self.

Now your involvement with your spiritual self is an interesting concept. What that means is that through your alignment to the integrity of focus, you cannot help but do so in the power moment of Now. When you focus in the Now Moment, you are in total and complete alignment to God, and within the knowledge of God is the supreme essence of hope. It may seem difficult to wrap your mind around a word such as hope and allow yourself the release of clinging to a old paradigm definition that limits and confines you to repetitive behaviors, habitually setting up the manifestation of a reality which supports and catalyzes separation. Separation feels normal to you, but it is not natural to you. For your natural inclination is to love. Your natural expression uses the natural world, which is a natural and fully realized spiritual exclamation of love. You are of the natural world. It is your birthright and as your birthright, is the consequential expression of truth.

So if truth is your natural foundation, how can you be so involved in a world of illusion for which natural inclinations are superceded by requirements, assumed dreams and concepts of separation? Make note, dear entities, that this illusory world is not inherently detrimental. It is not evil for there is no such thing. But it is glamorous and provides for an array of choices from which you, based on beliefs and attitudes and your assumptions of hope, determine your reality by quite literally vibrating the resonance as a statement of desire and issuing forth the consequent manifestation as a means by which you articulate your creative spirit. But when you give your focus to anything outside of love, that most basic and consummate fluidity of thought, the illusion and its glamour can suspend your clarity, which defines your thinking, which determines your choices, which focuses your vibration, which alerts the universe to your desires, which results in the physical representation of thought and your life as you know it.

Using the expanded version of hope that is the understanding of your divinity and your innate potential, not to achieve, but to exhibit your knowingness, is an opportunity to involve yourself with your spiritual self. It is to this involvement that all your choices are motivated at their very essence. But along the way, because of the illusion of this world and your habitual and repetitive choosing through default thinking, your spiritual self may seem distant and unattainable to you. But know this. Each of you is always in constant contact with your spiritual self. The key is to know this impeccably, to know that you and your spiritual self are One, that there is no separation, that there is only love and that whatever colors this illusion to highlight fear is just an enhancement of fear.

Fear is not who you are, but an experience you are having because you are choosing to have it. Recognize that you must be choosing to have it, because you are the power behind the choice. As the power behind the choice, old paradigm hope is not an option. You are the power, you are fully in control, and there is no absence of intention. Old paradigm hope cannot possibly enter into this equation. But know that expanded hope, the knowing that your spiritual essence lives and breathes freely, is always connected and is always impeccably functioning, even within this world of illusion and glamour. For you are God, experiencing this reality, creating this reality, experiencing the creation. As God you are the essence of hope. You are life and you are love. Know this, entities. Be clear with yourself. Acknowledge the game and you acknowledge your power. Acknowledge your power and you cannot possibly fear. Indeed. Adieu. With God you are and I am. So be it.
