The Potential Is Achievement, Opportunity or Hope

Good Day Entities! As the collective of the peoples of the earth engage in the methodical and routine daily regimens that lead to the closing of one year in anticipation of the opening of a new year, the concept of potential arises. Potential could be defined as pending achievement, available opportunity, or just plain hope. Each of you individually begin your own process of looking back in review of your past year, recognizing and applauding those areas wherein you achieved your goals and recognize that as your calendar year winds down, those goals unachieved must be relegated to your new priority list of resolutions for the coming new year. I find this a very interesting process as the process of achievement becomes segmented and charted as to require its own place in your process. It holds its own energy and its own condition, its own veritable life.

And indeed it does feel that way. As human beings, the act of achievement marks your place on your roadmap of life. It gets a gold star or an empathic underline on your must do list to spur you to action. Achievement is a very human condition. It is a clear indication of movement. It represents your position as you exert your energy toward a goal. So what exactly is achievement and what components of achievement surround your experience of potential for life expression?

First, it is important to recognize that achievement does not represent spirit as much as it represents the process within which spirit expresses in these bodies on this earth plane so rich in what you term potential. And what each of you term achievement varies individually and is measured by degree of importance. Each of you achieve the basic act of being alive moment to moment, which is an incredible feat, yet you do not generally place such an achievement on your must do list. Were you to create a situation wherein your health was challenged by your choices and the moment-by-moment creation of life seemed doomed then that achievement, in and of itself, would sparkle with importance. So you hold a certain amount of achievement to be a given. You are alive and well and capable of reaching out to new goals and concepts to experience with exhilaration. Most see achievement as very action oriented, something you do that has substance as a result.

Now, the components of achievement and also the components for the potential of achievement are unity, rhythm, flow and balance. As you set forth to experience anything, you must do so from a state of unity. The idea of unity is that of combining forces and elements of action together, holding form. And holding form is exactly what you do when you begin the process of manifestation. Fifth dimension is a dimension of form engaged through the use and function of your imagination. You think a thought using your fifth dimensional body, your mental body. This thought, through the Law of Manifestation, will establish itself as a visual representation in your third dimensional frequency. So, unity holds the form of what I term the template of creation. You are making the decisions and choices of what you wish to create by the very act of thinking about it and putting the incredible power of your attention to that thought.

Your emotional body, your fourth dimensional body, offers the passion and the energy to energize and support the thought you have just chosen. This passion is simply highly focused and directed energy, emotion, or energy in motion. This emotion holds no definition except for that which you assign it. In other words, you are not offering to the thought positive emotion or negative emotion, supportive or non-supportive emotion, good or bad emotion; you are simply offering the fuel of energy to charge the thought with the force of propulsion into the creative realm.

Now it is important to understand that every aspect of life holds a vibrational frequency. This frequency is like a statement of being, a statement regarding the current expression of that aspect. Each aspect stands alone on its own footing. When you bring these together in the process of manifestation, you establish a new unified vibrational frequency which is thrust into the creative universe to ignite universal excitement through the Law of Attraction which states, that which is liken unto itself is drawn. The universe offers unyielding obedience to the command of God and through the process of creation and manifestation, your thought, energized by emotion, is physically and visually represented before you in the form of your reality and all the aspects, relationships, circumstances, achievements, and potential available to you.

So the Law of Manifestation functions as an achievement of thought. The potential lives in the absolutely unlimited ideas and concepts which you choose from when picking the thought you energize. This thought shows up in physical form, using your third dimensional body. Your spiritual body, or sixth dimensional body, literally acts as a vessel to hold and unify your physical experience.

Our next component of achievement is rhythm. Your life literally takes on a rhythm of movement, a rhythm of choices, a rhythm of action. You move in step with your thought, in consequence to your creations and thrive with the repetitive elements of creation. Creation is a step-by-step process that comes so beautifully through you in liquid-like grace, that the very actions you articulate with your thoughts are often so intangible as to feel that they literally come from and through something else. Your own rhythm is so unique and so much a dance that the rhythm itself, the process, brings you a satisfaction in the doing of it.

But then, where does dissatisfaction spawn from if life itself is so rhythmic as to be basically and inherently joyful? It comes from false assumption or the illusion of separation. As illusions often deceive by their nature, the concept of separation can become a notion of thought that your thinking mind begins to contemplate, bringing form to it. When you join that form with the passion of emotion, you begin the creative process of manifesting the visual representation of fear into your reality.

Fear, when focused upon and aligned unto, has the capacity to jolt your rhythm, your natural ability to experience life from a joyful perspective. This capacity of fear has nothing to do with being more powerful than your natural inclination to joy. Rather, its seductive nature creates illusion, and illusion, with its filmy mists and deceptive nature, draws in your curious mind always engaged with finding more and more thoughts to explore and manifest. It becomes drawn to more and more focus leading to more and more thought manifestations of illusion. This propels a tendency to continue along that line of thought. In doing so, your focus shifts from your natural rhythm to the very unnatural rhythm of illusory thought. The illusion truly is that following illusory thought will lead to satisfaction wherein the opposite is true.

The component of flow, which literally acts as the connecting bridge between thoughts, actions, and experiences, is the element of achievement that registers within you as ease and grace. Flow feels good. It is that part of your expression that holds a significant draw to deliberately focusing your attention unto that which blends satisfaction with the sense of accomplishment or achievement. Flow rides on rhythm.

Now when you balance all these elements or components of achievement you experience a sense of equal proportion, a sense of clarity and a sense of controlled movement. Balance is key to understanding potential. All elements must not be exactly equal to experience balance, but they must be proportional within their expression. They must express their fullness. Is fullness of expression not what potential achievement is all about?

Entities, you are God and Goddess, aspects of All That Is that are unique and glorious extensions of Source through which life explores itself and loves itself, growing within and without itself. Life literally is potential and potential achieves life. The expression becomes itself. As you set forth your intentions for your coming year and you align yourself to the truth of your divine nature, achievement will become for you far more than physical representation of thought. Achievement will be known to you as the thriving essence of ongoing life in a sea of love, flowing with the rhythm of the universe in a unified field of balanced light. You are the light and the way. You are the ultimate achievement and you hold the potential for All That Is because you are All That Is in manifest form. Recognizing this and focusing your thoughts with alignment to love unifies your field of energy to joy, your most natural achievement. Live your joy Entities and know love, your highest potential.

Now let us speak in regard to joy. As you look toward a new year, a fresh time, a blank canvas, no matter what goal you set forth to achieve, which solitary outcome, the component of that goal resides with joy. You want to have fun and en-joy, be in joy, with what you are doing through the process of imagining it, to intending it, to its accomplishment or achievement. You make your choices for goals based on what excites and supports you. Or do you? It would seem the logical thing to do. It would seem the reasonable thing to do. But is it really joy which motivates your action or do you guilt yourself and require of yourself to finish the unfinished, to achieve in order to receive applause from others, to meet social requirements or meet the challenges laid forth for you by others. Which is it for you?

A great deal will be asked of you in your coming year. There are challenges lurking in the shadows which will surface to engage you into alignment with them. These challenges may meet your approval and choosing to align to them may feel easy and comfortable. But what if your beliefs render these challenges unacceptable individually yet the call is a global call? What I am speaking of here centers around your political climate.

Politics enters into all areas of life, not simply centering around your governments. You engage in the politics of business, the politics of relationships, the politics of religion. You throw the phrase of “politically correct” around freely and some of you even try to achieve this condition, while others find such an attempt fruitless and literally endangering to individual rights and freedoms. And it will be just those rights and freedoms that these shadow challenges will bring to light.

You have very substantive and far-reaching choices to make in this coming year, for as a global society in this politically charged atmosphere, achievement is uppermost in the minds of man. What is in question is whether this achievement will bring joy or whether the choices made individually (making up a collective opinion) will honor individual truth or if it will align to fear. The components of potential and achievement are significant to all choices, whichever side of the polarity pole they fall upon. And choices will be called for.

The seeds for social unrest have been sown and the choices most pertinent to your coming year are in regard to their nurturing or their withering. If this question is posed to you, “Which would you want?”, the majority of you would say, of course, peaceful unification of our global society wherein equality and freedom are cornerstones of life. But if your choices are not made from an alignment to truth and love, this unification cannot exist and separation will become the predominant theme and therefore stimulate the awakening of the shadow challenges.

So what would be the criteria for clear and intentional choices for joy? The criteria would hold the parameters of truth and individual resonance. Some of you may question that I am continually referencing the importance of individual choice, whereas it appears that community choice made with the community in mind would be required for global freedom. It appears that when choices are made for the masses, the masses must be seen as the most important. You hold beliefs that say the individual must sometimes be sacrificed for the good of the whole. To that notion, I suggest rethinking.

It would be a virtual impossibility for the mass body of mankind to make a collective choice because that mass body is composed of individuals. Many of you experience the phenomenon of participating in or viewing the crowd at a ball game and what is termed "the wave" is accomplished. The wave itself is comprised of masses of individuals who, in concert, agree to participate in a cooperative venture, to move in a unified, fluid form that appears as one whole wave of humanity. Such a venture requires mass agreement, but mass agreement breaks down to individual alignment to an idea or concept, a unity that appears to the individual to be important enough to participate within. Hence, you have "the wave" and the fun employed by participating in it.

Now, individually, is the idea of war fun? Is it something you joyfully agree to en masse? Or, is there a sense, propagated by the illusion of mass belief, or the illusion of mass guilt that war should happen in order to retain freedom? Do you really believe in war? Do you believe that freedom is so fragile that force is the only way to accomplish it? Is there joy in that? I doubt that many of you, faced with that question, would agree to participate in the wave of war by individual choice. More likely, the majority of you would individually feel there must be a more sane approach to securing freedom. With that last perspective is the key to joyful handling of the shadow challenges.

When you look at the concept of freedom, peace and global unity, you must think of individuals united in a common approach to truth. This common approach to truth need not be a replica of one country's ideas of what freedom, peace and global unity look like, but rather a composite of varied ideas and approaches that feed the common good and literally feed the notion of joy via the individual. The individual, as viewed by the cosmos, is a hologram of wholeness. In each of you is the seed of all life holding the DNA of love, the information or light of God. You are the wholeness to which you seek. Wholeness is already within you. Yet, when you feed into the alignment to fear and separated thought, achieving joy holds no potential. It cannot exist in the environment of fear.

Knowing that the individual holds the unity, the rhythm, the flow and balance of life is your most deliberate approach to freedom and peace. When you individually utilize the very components of potential and achievement, you literally become that potential and that achievement. You have choices upcoming and you have the means to make them in resonance to love. When you do so, you are in total resonance to yourself as the divinity you are and consequently, the individual creations of love and joy reflected in the consequent mass creation of your global society.

Being becomes the focus, not necessarily doing. When your focus is what to do, you will find as many potential ideas as to what is most correct as there are individuals to ask themselves the question. When you focus on being, the unity, the rhythm, the flow and balance of life forms the loving foundation for creation. It is your choice to experience the wave of joy or the wave of fear. I offer you the choice. Let no one else make it for you. Behold a beautiful world, a joyful condition of being, individual and en masse. Indeed. So be it. I am Nademus. I bid you adieu. With God you are and I am.
