Procrastination Delays the Moment of God Nademus

Good day entities. And it is a powerfully expressive day, as all days truly are. All days, all nights, all moments are expressions of God and therefore register the greatest of power and love. Knowing this enlivens the moment. Knowing this enlivens your individuated beingness in the realm of the material and your experience of life generated with gusto. But what if life does not generate with gusto? What if your life feels to you far less enthusiastic? What if your life is not “panning out” as you thought, wished and dreamed it would? If gusto is not the means by which you describe your sojourn here upon the plane of demonstration, then allow me to introduce a concept that is very likely a major part of your reality.

This concept is procrastination. Just what is procrastination and how does this contribute to an absence of gusto? Well entities, procrastination is that quality of life in which an individual delays, for any number of reasons, that which is called for, required, or dreamt of, as opposed to doing such in the moment. Procrastination serves as a means to put off an expression until another time. Now the idea that you can actually put off doing something until later presumably works in linear time. But in the real time of reality, which is simultaneous, everything occurs in the Now, that creative and divine moment in no-time that marches forward with the grace of illusion to feel to you as though there is actually a tomorrow in which the procrastinated event can occur.

What games you play with yourselves! For no matter how fixed you are on a future moment, it simply does not work that way. It may appear to be an unfair request to encourage thinking in this simultaneous fashion, but that indeed is the only true time, and I, Nademus, am always of the position of bringing to you reality, not the illusion of it. But, yes, I do understand, particularly having experienced your physical plane many times, that the credibility of past, present and future lends a great deal of power to the idea that procrastination is, in fact, a possibility.

Of what importance is a discussion of procrastination? To that I offer that your continued movement toward your ascension stimulates you to entertain and “try on”, so to speak, a number of new and old concepts. New to your current philosophies and old to the coding you register within your divine beings of attuning to and revering life and its source. Aligning unto the reverence of love within you as reflected by your macrocosm, your Mother Earth, and your solar deity, Ra, and all levels of Cosmic truth, profoundly positions you upon the Light grid of the love frequency that is at the basis of All That Is. You are an element of life that, with all other elements, seeks return to the Light from whence you came. In this perpetual return to the Light, you experience a great many opportunities to explore and grow and learn. But what if you don't? What if you procrastinate? Does it even have any meaning in the true sense of time?

The answer is yes and no - no from the standpoint of reality and yes from the position of truth. Procrastination is the most distinct level of denial of life that you experience on your earth plane, save for the act of suicide. Does that sound harsh? Too harsh for just waiting until tomorrow to do or experience something you professed to do today?

If you look at what procrastination is, the act of doing so speaks of many things. You first state forth, verbally or nonverbally, a desire to do or achieve something. Now a desire to do something is just that, an expression of desire that holds with it varying degrees of passion. If that passion is sufficient to make this desire a statement of intent, then desire holds a far greater degree of energy, a more distinct expression of self, directed in a far more focused manner aligning to the noble condition of intent. Intention is the one most powerful state of thought that you can participate with in the material realm as intention holds the focus and focus directs the manifesting properties of energy to that specific outcome. Intentions speak to the quality of life focus. In other words, what is important enough to you to encourage you to place your undivided attention, thus your focus, upon? And, if it is important enough to place your focus upon, it is important enough to maintain your focus upon. That simple process from focused desire to maintained focused desire is the basis of creation and creation is your birthright, your purpose and your divine expression.

So what is the problem with procrastination? Nothing. There is no problem. You cannot do anything wrong. But it is a statement of your denial of the importance of your own creativity. Your creativity and your focused and desired intent change the world. It changes your individual world and the world at large, because you each create your own reality by such focus, and through your mass cooperation and mass influence, you create your world at large. Your individual act of procrastination, or putting off your desired focus, is like delaying the Moment of God. And why would you ever want to delay the Moment of God? First, understand that delaying the Moment of God could only occur in the illusion of linear time and that indeed the Moment of God is, was and always will be.

This is the time frame you are moving toward as you ascend this plane. You are moving from linear time to no-time, or simultaneous time. You are awakening from a deep slumber and you are recapturing your creativity in a field of light that is your divine nature. You, in other words, can only procrastinate in linear space, but how can procrastination serve your evolution? How can making a focused intention “slide” into a future and indeed, non-existent moment, provide you or the world with a creative thrust? It is like revving and revving your car engine but never taking off the brake to move forward. Yes, you say it is safe. You are well aware of your surroundings and your doing so is not putting you in any perceived harm’s way. But you are also remaining in place, perceptively delaying the Moment of God. This delay is most likely precipitated by that rascal called fear. It is fear that is the culprit in the act of procrastination because delaying the Moment of God allows for no movement, thus keeping you in familiar surroundings. But familiar surroundings become stale and tired without the fresh additive of creative excitement. You are not a species born of fear. You are a species born of the greatest light and the greatest potential. Potential simply cannot be realized if you are marching in place.

Some of you may argue that, Nademus, am I not also being creative by creating the act of marching in place? Technically speaking, yes, you are creating your life, your being, and your world in every moment. But if you look at creativity in its broad sense and garner the wisdom of expressing that creativity, you are dealing with fresh, unknown, new levels of focus to engage energy and renew life. Procrastination uses old, tired, dull and unrefreshed default focus, lacking the vitality that befits a God such as you.

I encourage you to begin to, and to continue to, view the world as an ever-changing landscape, one that supports and nourishes you. Life vitality is your cornerstone and focused intent can create anything, absolutely anything. Knowing and understanding your personal power engages that creativity and it supports you to flex your creativity muscles in the Power Moment of Now in consecutive moments of creativity. Alerting yourself to where you are going on your ascending path offers the infinite outlook of your Creator, your Source. You are part and parcel of that.

I invite you to release your fear of such movement and relish in the fresh and enlivened expression that is yours with clear vision and an understanding of yourself as co-creator. Focused intent and your adherence to that focused intent overrides the fear that promulgates procrastination. Your choice of desire is clear. Acting in the moment aligns the energy and acting in the moment upon focused intent equals life. Live it to the fullest and love yourself in the process. There never is a time when procrastination satisfies and enlivens. Just the opposite. It nags and drags down and slows and reverberates with fear. That is not who you are. I repeat, fear is not who you are.

You are love and light, a species of spectacular resonance. I invite you to remember. It is easy. Simply put desired focused intent upon remembering and maintain that intent. Through the Laws of the Universe, your intent becomes the reality you experience. Allow yourselves to remember you are God.

Indeed, Adieu. With God you are and I am. So be it.
