Stop The Madness

Good day Entities! I am Nademus. As you awaken in these times of accelerated growth, your notions of living life have altered to such a degree that memories of quieter more peaceful times linger as a dream and a wish to hope for the return. Life is challenging you at a pace far beyond what you could ever imagine had, somehow, you been alerted to this beforehand. But indeed, you were alerted, many of your years ago, when teachers liken unto my self began to offer you cosmic truth and guidelines to remembering who you are. You were alerted to very basic considerations, such as you being God here in manifest form to explore a reality created by you and created by a collective consensus of relationships influencing and touching and suggesting and demanding upon one another. Your world now runs at a hectic pace with far more information available to you than you can assimilate, yet each tidbit is so tantalizing that it signals for more and more and more and . . . . Yet when the more arrives, and with speeds that overwhelm, then what are you currently capable of assimilating from it? What exactly is all this information doing for you? How does this information serve you when the masses of knowledge are so disseminated into fragments of ideas and tidbits of information and dispersed thought that you find it a chaotic soup of words and letters from which to choose. This begs the questions of what this information does for you.

You have been trained and programmed to believe that you must absorb as much as possible in order to keep up with the world, yet there are more wars than you can recall the names of; people are moving from position to position faster than they can be settled within that position; everything and everyone is on the move. Make haste!! Make haste!! you are told in profoundly quiet fashion by those in control. Keep up!! Keep up!! or you will lose. That is the battle cry. Your children seek education, yet the time allotted for learning cannot possibly equip them with a knowledge base sufficient to carry them through the ensuing periods of even more speed. And those children who are currently experiencing an absence of wealth find that to succeed in achieving the American dream, is a goal seemingly beyond their grasp as tuitions call for more and more gold to satisfy enrollment fees.

Let us accept this as a created reality and stop for breath for a moment. Just stop, relax, breathe deeply and evenly and feel the support of God. There. Now. Relax. Let us speak of what is important, of what is truly on your plate. You are being served a massive buffet, with incredible amounts of opportunity to choose from and your menu also indicates what are the favorites of the masses. You are told what to want and what to choose if you are to be considered successful. You are directed through a mass programming effort that aligns you to a sense of lack and a vague sense of fear that if you do not keep up, the most dire of consequences will occur. You will fail. You will not be considered worthwhile.

Remember when landing a job and sticking with the same company for life were the signs of success and met the approval of a generation of people for whom loyalty and service were supreme. Now, you see people not only transferring loyalties from job to job but also the corporate entities' themes literally pulling the rug out from under your very feet. Things are not the same in this generation and the next is even further into its experience of detachment to the values that grew this nation.

But, from the perspective of any one of these generational viewpoints, what is important? Using just the criteria of the job market as an example, what becomes clear is that there is not truly a common theme within these perspectives, other than the theme of get more, do more, faster, and do it for you selfishly, because you must. That is the way it is these days.

But if there were no corporations, no job markets, no stock exchanges, no universities, no white picket fences and comfortable homes, if you were to allow yourself a movement of gazing deeply inside yourself for what is truly important, would any of these ideas come forth? I think not. What would come forth is a gentle, nurturing wave of relief when allowed to relax into you. A blessed silencing of requirements while a vast vista of opportunity opens up to your vision. This vista isn't digital information and it isn't televised pre-subscribed dreams. It is your personal vista of choice, your freedom of choice, your gift of spirit.

Given the moments of peaceful serenity, your choices turn to feelings of love and inclusion, nurturing and lightness, peaceful serenity with purpose. You turn inward to the most beautiful landscape ever to grace the eye or the heart. You turn inward to the love that you are and the eloquent simplicity that expresses that love when you allow yourself the freedom to reside in that place and to choose from that place in the creating of your reality. Personal implementation of talents and artistic gifts, the sense of community and involvement stimulate the actions of joining and they nurture the action of gifting to those drawn to your landscape by like thinking. You become a radiant thread in a tapestry of life innately aware of direction and truth. You weave your tapestry in the colors of experience and joy and you thrive on unity.

You recognize love as the basis for all life. You become One with All That Is and you recognize that All That Is is all things and you are One with all things. One becomes your mantra and One becomes your direction. And with this tapestry you know the truth and you can distinguish the truth and you can discern between what is offered to you as truth and what is real. You know, because you are experiencing yourself as the divine entity you are. And you are doing so because you chose to stop the madness to connect with soul. Once you allow yourself the freedom to do this, you create a vision for life that can encompass the madness and find order within it. As you reenter the madness from this enlivened perspective, you shine the light of God upon the chaos and it transforms. You control your experience and offer the insight of truth to those in your attraction circle. You become the light that leads and peacefully directs any who wish to illuminate their reality by truth, the truth that you are divine. Indeed Entities. Adieu. With God you are and I AM. So be it.
